This is a complex, full-bodied beer with a huge melange of different grains that infuse perfectly in the brewing process. The beer pours out a beautiful mahogany color and has a hint of coffee, chocolate, and a good dose of hops to give a pleasant finish. This is an incredibly enjoyable beer that isn't too hard on the palate or light bodied. Rich flavours of bready, yeasty, biscuity, sweet malts make this DIPA the perfect start to summertime. Serving: 12 oz Cans I was provided a sample of this beer by DBC Craft Beer. Ratings: Aroma – The hops have a nice presence in this beer, but are hidden by the subtle aroma of the malts that make up the base of the beer. Flavour – This beer starts off on the sweet side of the flavour spectrum. The hops add a nice piney element while the rich, yeasty malt is present to make this beer taste nice and malty and complex. Drinkability – This is a great beer for the season, and one that I'll be ordering again. Notes: Mash bill 6.5 lbs American 2 Row @ 154 60 min Mash hopping

Gameplay X: The ThreatWorker competence in the care of elderly people: the "Elderly at Risk" study. The risk of nursing home abuse is well established. To identify nursing home abuse and potential risk factors for abuse, the authors developed the Elderly at Risk study (EARS). The EARS study was a prospective epidemiologic investigation in two Connecticut nursing homes. Using a stratified sampling strategy, a sample of 409 elderly people was chosen from two institutions. All subjects were assessed by interviewers blind to other information about the residents. The interviews, which took place in the subjects' apartments, lasted about 1 hour and used a set of structured clinical instruments. The authors found an overall abuse rate of 37%, most commonly to the head (n = 42), followed by psychologic harm (n = 30). Psychologic harm was the most common indicator of physical abuse (P =.00) followed by the care-giver's intent to physically harm (P =.00). Indicators of neglect included an unpaid care-giver (P =.00) and poor access to medications (P =.00). The results of the EARS study show that abuse of elderly people in nursing homes is a major problem. There are several potential risk factors for abuse, including psychological problems, disability, poor access to medications, living with a care-giver who does not need to care, and lack of nursing aide training.Q:

Explained Joseph Hayden – May 26, 2017 Introduction: X2: The Threat Explained is both a tutorial and a review of a book. There are many two-day seminars to train "real" pentesters, and you will want to read this review before you do. You may not feel like you need to learn network analysis in a 2-day seminar: you figure most of it out from books and movies. In fact, two-day seminars often have a skimming component. (I heard that Social Engineering 101 had a skimming component.) I cannot emphasize enough how important network analysis is if you are going to be a real network security analyst. Parsing People®'s review for X2 is a whole different kettle of fish. We are interested in knowledge and not passing a test. That said, this review (among other things) will teach you how to do all the things that the book will teach you. The book is written in a British accent, and that will be a challenge for your brain: this is a book for Americans in English, not every Yank could read the rest of the things written in a British accent, and you are a dumbshit; you can learn an accent just to avoid getting ejected from a movie theater over one. Proofpoint examines how threat actors are changing their approach to targeting US organizations. From pivot attacks to infiltrating the humanitarian and government sectors, threat groups have expanded their reach in the United States in recent years. Vulnerability researcher and spear-phishing expert Paul Gillen said the threat intelligence agency InfoArmor has noticed a worrisome shift from "all-guns-blazing attacks" to stealthy tactics used to maintain access to a target's network and infrastructure. Transport Layer Security (TLS) encryption has been a hot topic since late 2015, when the U.S. intelligence community warned of stolen credentials and a shift to passive attacks via insider help. Reveal researcher Ollie Kennedy cites a draft of a top-secret intelligence report distributed inside the network engineering community that claims the Russian government and others have developed a system they call "BadStar" to attack and exploit systems with vulnerable Nginx applications With the largest ever cache dump targeting the US, and only months after the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) concluded a massive breach at a second retailer, this was not only a month to make believers of those who say it's not as easy
